COMPETITION AS A SOURCE OF DEVELOPMENT IN THE MARKETING

Key words: marketing, competition

One of the key issues in the development of the market is the competition. As a process, competition is trying to be better among the companies producing similar products in the same industry. In global markets, competition comes from an increasingly wide range of sources. To protect its position as a successful organization, every company must identify new opportunities, understand and recognize the types and sources of competition and, where possible, predict their activities.

Successful marketers are those who can steer their organizations through difficult aspects of the marketing environment, and do it better than the competitors. Competitor analysis helps to identify the behavior patterns competitors might adopt in response to marketing tactics such as price–cutting or promotion. A three-step process can be used to diagnose the competitive environment: (1) elicit from a panel of consumers an array of products that are similar to the referent product based on perceptual cues, functional benefits, or higher-level needs; (2) with the help of consumers and industry experts, pinpoint firms which can or do produce these products; and (3) use data on these two dimensions to map the position of potential and actual competitors in relation to the referent product.

In modern conditions of fierce competition in the market for effective development of all forms of ownership there has been also use of benchmarking technology. Benchmarking is devoted to research and analysis of products, technologies, methods and solutions from leading companies to be introduced in the economic activities of the company.

Going through two these processes may help firms identify opportunities for product improvement or new product development, product positioning strategies, new markets, and ways to improve marketing and manufacturing program. Analyzing an industry’s competitive pattern can help directors and marketing managers make strategic and tactical market decisions.

In conclusion, the competitive environment, properly defined, indeed represents a potentially fruitful source of marketing ideas. The competition is not only the engine of trade, but also contributes to: the development of marketing, creative approach to business development, generation of new ideas, and creation of innovation and the introduction of other competitive advantages.
